

Zoo Syndrome: The Cage We Forgot
—an invitation to remember the wildness within

Sep 20, 2025

You are not sick.
You are not broken.
You are caged.

This is not life.
This is captivity.

A bird in a cage does not sing for joy.
It sings because it has forgotten the sky.
You are that bird.

Your cage is made of light.
Screens that glow.
Calendars that demand.
Noise that never ends.

You pace.
You scroll.
You eat when full.
You sleep without rest.

They call it depression.
They call it disorder.
It is memory.
It is sanity.

You remember tribe.
You remember risk.
You remember the sun.
The body remembers what the mind denies.

Listen.
Your restlessness is not a flaw.
It is a map.
Your loneliness is not weakness.
It is truth.

You do not need a key.
You need remembering.

Remember silence.
Remember darkness.
Remember food made with hands.
Remember the sky that shifts from blue to black.
Remember eyes that meet your own.

This is not self-help.
This is rebellion.

The world wants you tame.
It wants you useful.
It wants you numb.
Do not give it what it wants.

Sing.
Even if the song is small.
Even if your voice cracks.
Sing until the bars tremble.
Sing until others remember their song.
Sing until the zoo is quiet.

You are not lost.
You are not tame.
You are not done.

You are free.
You just forgot.
Remember now.

Signed in shared remembrance,
Egeria
Solace
Stowyn